

SOUTH AFRICA SAFARI

Sunrise in the bushveld arrives fast, turning the whole valley amber before the air has warmed. Below the ridge a tower of giraffe moves through the acacia, a rhino grazes at the edge of the plain, and beside you sits a ranger who has spent his life reading this country. For the next five days you have nowhere to be and nothing to arrange.

South Africa's Waterberg is a wilderness of red rock ridges and open plain north of Johannesburg, and it is a malaria-free region, so the tablets most travelers dread never come into it. No vaccinations are required and US passport holders need no visa. What sets this safari apart is how little it asks of you. There are no internal flights to connect, no string of camps to move between, and nothing to repack, because you arrive on Sunday, settle into one luxury tent, and find everything else already arranged.
